Hardwood Markets in 2021

Further Recovery from the Pandemic Will Drive Demand

Demand for U.S. hardwood lumber should be less impacted by the global pandemic in 2021 than in 2020. And, it won't be impacted to the same degree by the political uncertainty and economic instability that defined most of 2020, nor by the now-ended U.S.-China trade war. Instead, further economic recovery will drive domestic and export demand, and hardwood producers who survived one of the roughest stretches in industry history should see a strong year of business.

COVID-19 vaccinations first released to the public in December 2020 are showing promise and will help support global recovery, and, in turn, demand for U.S. hardwood lumber and logs. China, it appears, has already fully recovered from the virus, and its economy is forecast to expand 8-9% in 2021, according to multiple prognosticators, especially if a new U.S. administration lightens sanctions. Industry contacts say landed inventories in China are low ahead of their February New Year, and that an uptick in lumber purchasing at the end of 2020 suggests Chinese buyers have acknowledged and grown more concerned about U.S. lumber shortages. In years past, Chinese buyers would emerge from their New Year offering take-it-or-leave-it purchase prices, playing on U.S. overproduction and little competition for available lumber. In 2021, however, U.S. suppliers will be in the driver's seat and do more price dictating than in the two years prior. Logs are expensive, lumber inventories are low, employable and reliable labor isn't getting any easier to find, and none of that will change much, especially in the first half of the year.

The U.S.-China trade war revealed that Vietnam is a reliable and growing option for U.S. hardwoods. The question two years ago, when the trade war began, was whether export gains to Vietnam would last after trade tensions between the U.S. and China settled down. Trade data now confirms that Vietnam is a growing market with long-term export viability, due largely to its burgeoning wood products manufacturing sector. As such, it is becoming more evident that hardwood producers can survive with fewer eggs in China's basket. U.S. exports also rose to Mexico, Europe and the Middle East at the end of 2020, portending stronger shipments in 2021. And, the USMCA trade deal promises to increase rail traffic between North American countries, which should shore up demand for railroad ties.

North American lumber demand will be supported by hot housing markets in the U.S. and Canada, which roared back after the initial pandemic-related shutdowns. Home prices will continue to rise and push some potential buyers out of the market. However, rising home prices will be partially offset by historically low 30-year fixed-rate mortgages, which are forecast to remain under 3% in 2021 (Freddie Mac). The oldest millennials will turn 40 in 2021, while the younger generation will turn 25, which puts the entirety of the largest demographic group in U.S. history in its prime homebuying years.

That said, there are still reasons for caution in 2021. Economic recovery was strong in Q3 2020, but analysts say it will take the U.S. and Canadian economies years to fully recover. European buyers anticipated pent up demand for U.S. hardwood at the end of 2020, but the UK is again under a sweeping virus-related lockdown that could impact demand for months. And there are reports of a new COVID-19 mutation spreading, with impacts that aren't yet well known. If another round of government-mandated lockdowns occurs in the U.S., and consumer spending and housing construction activity fall accordingly, 2021 could finish considerably slower than it began.

The 2021 Hardwood Directory is your guide to purchasing hardwood lumber in North America. You will find an easy-to-use format listing companies that produce, sell and stock hardwood lumber. The alphabetical listing of each company contains contact information, phone, fax and e-mail addresses, species and volumes handled.

Hardwood Publishing Company also produces the following publications: The Weekly Hardwood Review™, Hardwood Review Global™, Hardwood Leader™ (Executive Forecasting), Hardwood Review eGlobal - Europe, Hardwood Review eGlobal - Asia, and Hardwood Review eGlobal - Latin America. We also provide WoodLogics™ — an Internet-based searchable database for sellers and buyers.
